Android sqlite mysql sync github

Android sync sqlite database with server using php and mysql github.

The problem is how the server can know if the app side successfully inserted the data into SQLite so that server can update the data sync status from 'N' to 'Y'? You can't perform that action at this time. Reload to refresh your session. You can't perform that action at this time. You can't perform that action at this time. You signed out in another tab or window. It requires four parameters when using onSuccess and onFailure method. In our project full customisation support would be necessary. Will my concept work or is there any other way to implement this sync concept? Now when app wants to sync (can be done with the same request for sync from app (push) as above or a new request for sync (update)), the server will be sending the data of which the sync status are 'N'. PS: I have already searched for the similar queries and that does not satisfy me. 2 I am working on a project that needs to sync my server side MySQL to my App SQLite and vice versa. How Git and GitHub is pushing data and updating its database? Android: how sqlite database could be used to store the user data when internet is not available and then synchronise the stored data automatically with server when device is connected to internet (i want the scenario how it works) my data will contain strings, as well as images, but i will store image path instead of images in sqlite database. If internet connection available, both server and app side databases are inserted with sync status 'Y'. The one of parameters is errorResponse, the old library used one parameter with String datatype for errorResponse, whereas the new library requires byte[] datatype for errorResponse. I do not want to use any framework. Android checks the new data at the server, if there are some new data, data will be pulled to android and will be inserted into sqlite, if anybody can explain me with simple example code then it will be grateful am just a beginner. You can't perform that action at this time. After inserting that data successfully, server sends its response to the app as "success", so that App can update the status of the data (with sync status 'N') to new status 'Y'. PUSH I have successfully implemented the app side where a user can insert a new data into the SQLite Database with sync status 'N' if no internet connection is available. After successfully fetching the response of the server, app will insert the new data to its SQLite database with sync status 'Y'. You signed in with another tab or window. The origin code comes from thank you for programmergruru 'AAAA'. UPDATE When a user wants to insert new data from the portal side, at first the server side database will be inserted with the new data with sync status 'N'. The project will be having both portal and App side implementation. Is there any way to give response to the server (the reverse process!) from the app? Am I doing anything wrong? I modified some code to be adjusted with the newer version of android (with Android Studio IDE), furthermore, I used two libraries: android-async-http-1.4.9 gson-2.2.4 The newer android-async-http is different with the former. If internet connection changes (Internet connection switched ON), App sends its data from SQLite with sync status 'N' to the server for new insert into the MySQL database. The problem is with the reverse process... process...
